

A non-functional account of word order variation in German and Polish

Gisbert Fanselow (University of Potsdam)

There seems to be a consensus that the free word order we observe in German or Polish serves the need to express distinctions of information structure such as "topic", "focus", or "given". We argue that this link to information packaging is a side effect of a. the connection between linearization and accentuation and b. the connection between accentuation and information structure.
